Session abstract: During the past decade research in West Mexico has been rapidly increasing information regarding the importance of the area for understanding the processes involved in Mesoamerican culture growth. Once considered a sort of backwater for developments originating in central Mexico, West Mexico is now known to have been the possible source of several important contributions to the development of Mesoamerican culture. In many respects, however, West Mexican archaeology is still in its infancy, subject to constant reinterpretation. What will be attempted in these papers is the expression of new understandings in West Mexican archaeology which have developed from recent individual research, and which have potentially broad implications for reinterpreting present knowledge about some facet of West Mexican prehispanic cultural development.

Discussants: Frank Hole, William A. Longacre II, Stuart Struever, Raymond H. Thompson
- Symposium abstract: Anthropologists, especially archaeologists, have devoted a great deal of attention to the problem of the evolution of more complex social systems, and ultimately to the development of civilization. It would seem that situations in which the more complex systems did not develop are also pertinent to this general problem. Such a situation seems to have existed among the village tribes of the Missouri Valley in North and South Dakota. Two variants of the Plains village pattern existed there, with a combined time span of some nine centuries before any serious effects of white contact. Subsistence was based on both horticulture and the exploitation of vast herds of bison. Other resources, with the exception of timber, seem to have been more than adequate. Procurement systems operated with the use of a highly specialized technology. Population densities in at least some of the area were comparable to pre-conquest ones in parts of the Valley of Mexico. However, there are no indications that the native societies ever progressed beyond the level of autonomous villages. Commentators familiar with areas where more complex societies developed are commenting on possible reasons for the lack of comparable advances in the Middle Missouri region.
